January 2025 began with a farewell. Farewell to the publishing client end of the business. This happened because retirement thoughts began to ring the “time to slow down” or “quit” bell. When it rang for me, I did so knowing I wasn’t totally leaving the world of books.

What closing the client publishing end for me meant is more time for me to write, to read, and to garden. And... have more time to do the simple ‘little things’ in life that brings me joy.

This doesn’t mean I won’t think of all the authors who have trusted me with their manuscripts – manuscripts that made it through to at least the Trade Copy and/or eBook publication process. To all of you that I made this journey with, it was good getting to know you, and I sincerely hope as we made this journey together I was able to help make a difference in your writing journey. One that included taking my recommendations to heart and learning to be a better author along the way.

I wish all of you to continue your writing journey. Never stop writing or learning.
